Diversity Means Change

Imagine: you are face to face with your inner being. Nightfall is approaching, along with the tears of the sky telling you that somewhere along the line, you made a mistake. Spider-Man 3 brought this concept out; how one could become diverse and have to change for the better to become who they really are; a mortal.

Diversity has taken place in almost everyone's lives. Whether it was racism or sexism, one word was able to describe all of these; change. Change is an important concept that relates to these because making one change can make all the difference. Spider-Man knew that he had made wrong decisions; before he knew it, he himself had changed—for the worst.

Most people tend to become diverse to others when they have the idea that they are better than them: that they have more intelligence, more money; more power. The worst part about these people is that they become addicted to acting this way; like having an addiction for drugs or alcohol. It takes real courage, bravery, and intelligence to realize that what they are doing harms people and themselves.

The turning point in the movie came when Spider-Man was left mortally “defeated” by all the wrong decisions he made in his life. The options that remained at this point were either to stay the former shadow of himself or let change take place. He chose to be the best of himself; he chose to change. Not only did he manage the rest of his life (in this case the rest of the movie), but he also managed the lives of others because one change can make all the difference.

Diversity can be a challenge to overcome in a person; only the realization and conclusion of what you have become will make you change. Changing for the better will lose the addiction of hurting others through discrimination due to their race or sex. Overall, you would become a better person as if you lost that addiction to drugs or alcohol. Being diverse to others can lead to making the wrong decisions. On the other hand, change opens up the path to a bright future. What is similar about being diverse and going through change is that diversity is what gives us the opportunity to make change happen.
